

Luxury Resorts Making a Difference for Sea Turtle Conservation

Across some of the world's most breathtaking coastlines, luxury travel experiences are increasingly being paired with meaningful conservation efforts. At resorts like The Brando, Trisara and Kokomo Private Island, protecting endangered sea turtles has become an important part of the guest experience.

With World Turtle Day approaching on May 23, these properties are spotlighting the critical work being done to protect vulnerable turtle populations through scientific research, habitat preservation and community engagement.

Kokomo Private Island: Supporting Research and Local Communities

In Fiji, Kokomo Private Island is working closely with researchers to better understand and protect sea turtle populations throughout the region.

The resort partners with the University of the South Pacific and marine researcher Dr. Susanna Piovano to monitor nesting sites on nearby islands and identify key turtle habitats.

Their work includes protecting nesting grounds, collecting critical turtle data and educating local communities to ensure long-term conservation success.

As one of the earliest contributors of turtle data in Fiji's Kadavu region, Kokomo has identified hawksbill nests and green sea turtles both on the island and throughout nearby reefs, where turtles can often be spotted year-round.

Travel That Supports Conservation

For travellers increasingly seeking meaningful experiences, these resorts demonstrate that luxury and sustainability can go hand in hand.

Whether it's witnessing hatchlings make their first journey to the sea, learning from marine researchers or simply staying at properties that actively protect fragile ecosystems, guests at these destinations can enjoy unforgettable vacations while supporting important conservation work around the world.
